

Bloomin' Brands

Christopher Noe

The 2007-09 Great Recession took a huge bite out of the U.S. restaurant industry as consumers ate out less often. Even during the subsequent economic recovery, ongoing financial concerns continued to depress the appetite for eating out. The casual dining sector, situated in the middle ground between fast food and fine dining, was particularly hard hit. By the summer of 2016, however, some investors were taking a fresh look at casual dining stocks. Their investment thesis was rooted in the belief that having experienced over a half dozen years of unremarkable, yet consistent economic growth, consumers would feel more inclined to eat out and be willing to splurge a little on those dining experiences.

Casual Dining Restaurants

In 2016, the U.S. restaurant industry was projected to total nearly $800 billion in sales, accounting for 4% of GDP and employing nearly 1 in 10 Americans.¹ Restaurants varied widely in the experiences they offered customers, from upscale, sit-down venues with exceptional wait staff to walk-in, drive-in or -thru outlets prized for their quick service.

Casual dining restaurants comprised a category of eateries that offered a more comfortable dining experience compared to fast food but were considered more affordable and family friendly than fine dining establishments. Fast casual restaurants represented a variation on the casual dining theme. They provided a step up from fast food in terms of quality, ambiance, and menu options, while continuing to emphasize speed by forgoing table service in favor of having customers place their orders at a counter.

Bloomin' Brands

In 1988, Bloomin' Brands, opened the first Australian-themed Outback Steakhouse restaurant in Tampa, Florida.² Outback was known for its “No Rules, Just Right” mentality and its bloomin’ onion signature appetizer. The bloomin’ onion consisted of one large onion, cut to resemble a flower, battered, deep-fried, and served with dipping sauce or a variety of other toppings, including melted cheese, chili, and steak tips.

Bloomin’ continued to expand over the years, and the company went public in 2012.³ By June 2016, Bloomin’ owned 1,335 restaurants and franchised 166 restaurants across four casual dining brands — Outback, Fleming’s Prime Steakhouse & Wine Bar, Bonefish Grill, and Carrabba’s Italian Grill.⁴ Approximately 85% were located in the U.S., and almost two-thirds were operated under the Outback brand.⁵
